

Nang loeng, a market older than 120 years. A place filled with memories passed on and shared with food. A lot of the food here dates back to the old days of Thailand's cuisine because this market is the first land market in Thailand. Back then, people would do business and sell goods on boats. Since the market opens early and closes fast, I decided to create an immersive experience for people to come and interact with the space by creating a design representing some of the stores in the market. I picked nantha kanom thai, khao chae phetchaburi, kanom tuay talai montha and sakoo mae sa ing. All the designs will let people interact with them by using your four senses: smell, hearing, touch, site. You might be wondering why not five. This is because the space will still be operating even after the market closes. This is for people who don't have the opportunity to go to the market during the opening time, causing them to lack the fifth sense, which is taste, because they couldn't come taste the food at the opening time of the market. With this, they will get to experience the market while it's close and without tasting the food.
